NOTES ON WRITING CHINESE WITH ROMAN LETTERS.

As the Chinese have no phonetic alphabet, enabling them to distinguish in writing the separate articulations of the voice, the pronunciation of their words is defective as that of any nation must be, that depends simply upon the oral communication of words. Their learned men have been anxious to distinguish the intonation of the syllable, as they found themselves unable to analyse it. The tone or intonation of the syllable being deemed of more importance than the enunciation of it, a certain latitude of pronunciation was allowed, where there was no means to define the exact limit. The sounds of some letters were confused;—l, m, n, were often interchanged; the aspirates and sibilants were frequently intermixed and put one for the other.

This uncertainty would lead many to suppose that Chinese could hardly be written down at all in Roman characters; if one man calls a certain character ma, another calls it ba, and another pa, we are ready to despair of arriving at a correct orthography. By no means; we must copy from the majority, from the educated, from the man with a distinct utterance, and we may supply their wants, by deciding by what letters we shall write down their articulations. But we must not be too nice in coming to a conclusion, nor need we invent new letters to meet the defects, or differences rather, in Chinese pronunciation. Our characters are all-sufficient, if we only explain the value which we give to them. Taking the simple letters of the English alphabet, we can write down nearly every Chinese sound, save the intonation, of which there is no question here.

The vowels are of the greatest importance: starting from the a, i, and u, (pronounced as in Italian, ah, ee, and oo,) by their simple combinations we may form the various diphthongs ai, au, ia, iu, ua, ui, (pronounced as ī, ow, yah, yew, wah, wee,) and again the triphthongs iai, iau, (yai, yow,) uai, uau, (wai, waw.) Next we have the modifications of all these in the dialects of China, just as we have the corruption of pronunciation in some of our English counties. The ai verges upon e, (pronounced ay, or a,) the au on ō, the iu on ü, the a and also the ō again change into ó as in order. The e may be followed by u and stand for a sound like that of how when pronounced by a north-countryman. Each letter receives its own proper pronunciation. This eu is again modified into an indistinct sound, like its equivalent in the eu of the French in peu, and may be represented by ě, or ï, or ǎ.

The simple vowels, and also the modifications may be shortened, and uttered abruptly; they may be accented or unaccented; in the latter case they are hardly distinguishable from one another. The syllable met may be easily distinguished from mit or mot, but in such syllables as de in derive, on in mason, al in vocal, these words might be written dūraiv, mesün, vokül, and the syllables dä, ün, ül, uttered with the same vowel sound. Hence in unaccented syllables the short vowels are interchangeable. So also in Chinese; and we may affirm the same of several of the vowels in the closed syllables, (as cheng, teng, &c.,) in that language. To explain by example;

正 ching or cheng, 眞 chin or chen, are equally good spellings in each case. It is therefore ridiculous to contend about shades of pronunciation that are almost imperceptible from their very nature, and are unnoticed by the natives themselves.

These few remarks are merely intended as a friendly warning to the beginner not to be led astray by science, falsely so called, which affects a fastidious taste and does not lead to the truth in the end. By confining the system of orthography within bounds, a thoroughly correct pronunciation will be cultivated, while a simple system of spelling will be instituted; and as we hope that the time may arrive when both the great nations of the Far East,—China and Japan—will employ the Roman letter, as being more practically useful than any other at present in use, the prevalence of a simple system will be a great advantage to them and to us.

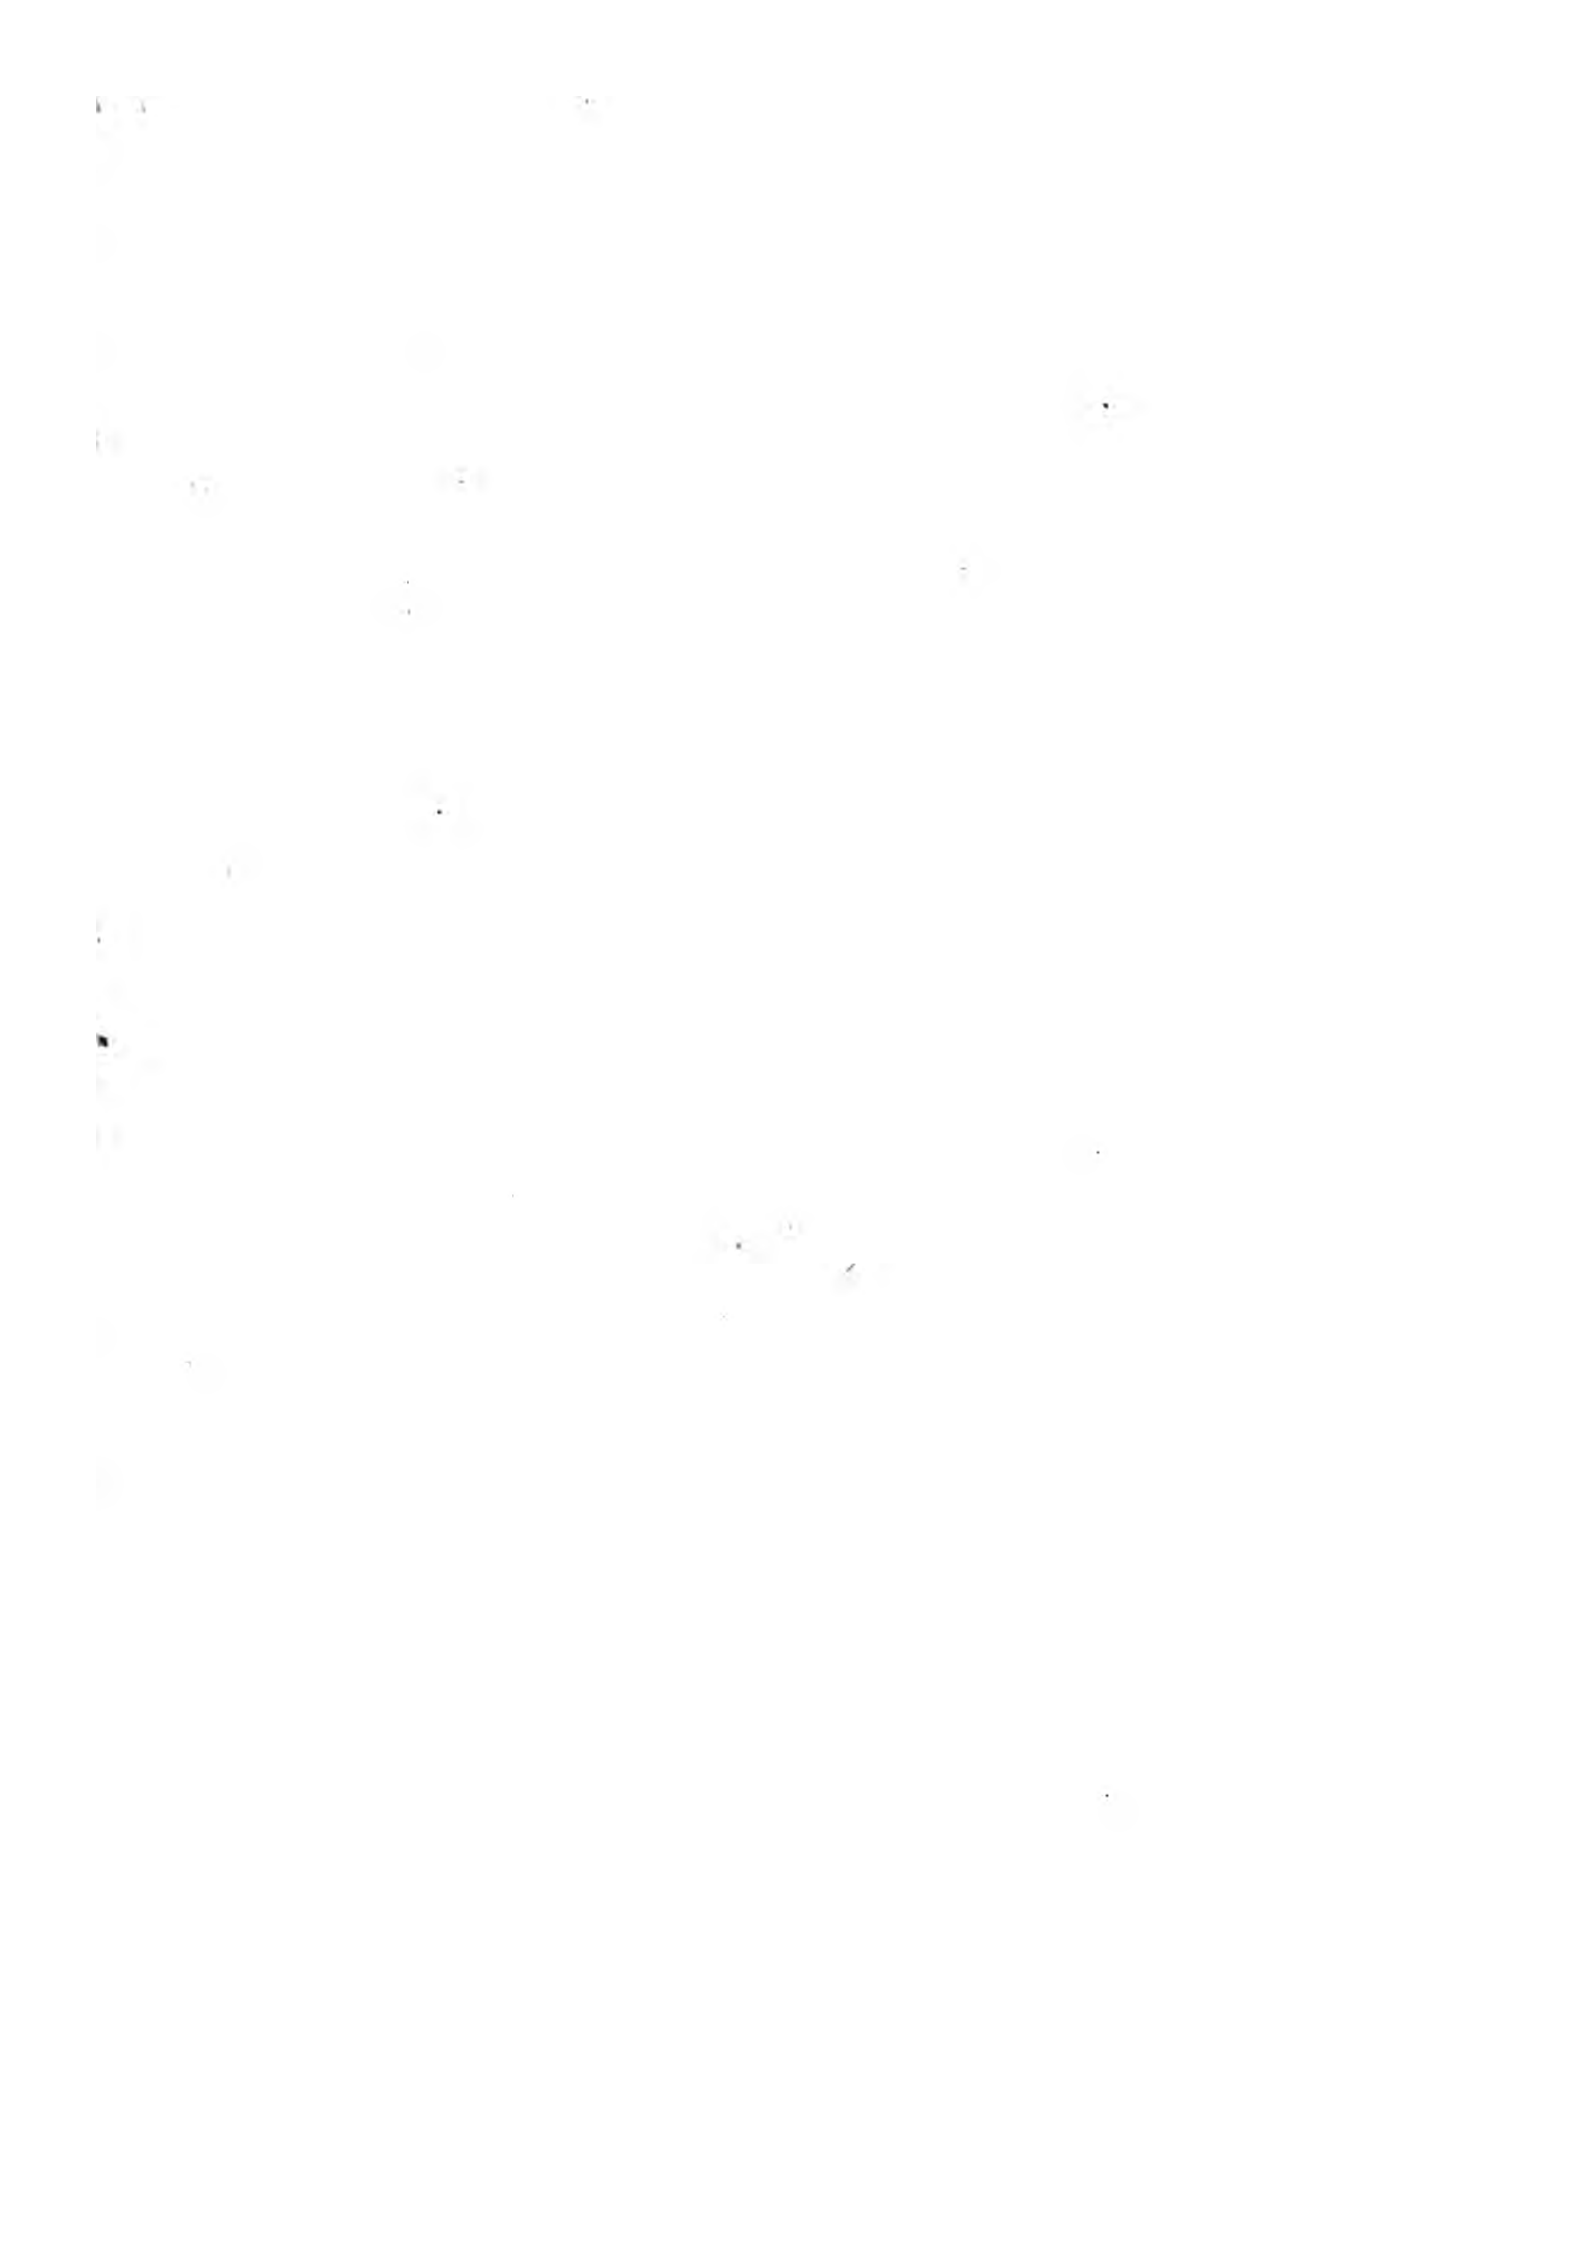

As those who use this book will doubtless be acquainted with several of the works already published on Chinese and Japanese, we may just refer them to the elaborate system prepared by Mr. Secretary Wade, C.B. for the Pekin dialect, and Dr. W. Williams, for the Southern Dialect, that of Canton. They are both based on the Continental systems of orthography, especially the Italian. The former is now adopted very generally in the ports of China, and the latter almost universally used by residents in Canton, Hongkong, &c., for the local dialect.

We have not referred here to the consonantal sounds, because they may be represented exactly as our own, though they sometimes differ in force. As a substitute for the ch used by Mr. Wade in words pronounced in the Southern Mandarin with a k sound, followed by i or u, we would recommend tk, a form which the Abbé Mermet, an experienced Japanese scholar, has employed in his new Japanese dictionary. Thus:—tki would equal the ci of the Italian, the soft ch or ki of the Chinese, the ć of the Poles, the ki of the Swedes, &c., but this is a matter of slight consequence, and we think it better to follow the established rule, rather than diverge, and so create confusion for ourselves and others.
